

Abstract

A system-level simulation of hardware devices, each of which may have different timing requirements, utilizes one or more master objects and update objects (e.g., a clock object) in order to coordinate the device simulations. The master object may, for example, advance the update objects according to one or more criteria and then instruct an object representing a hardware device to execute.